Specific learning disorder (SLD) affects specific abilities in children with an otherwise normal academic development. It refers as a heterogeneous group of neurobehavioral disorders that clinically manifested by significant unexpected, specific and persistent difficulties in the acquisition and use of efficient reading, writing, or mathematical abilities. It generally occurs despite intact senses, normal intelligence, adequate motivation, and socio-cultural opportunities. Of late, awareness regarding SLD in India has increased, especially among school authorities. However, insufficient knowledge about SLD and its assessment and remediation still present in professionals and general population.
